

SOME MONTHS ago, in this space, I commented on the past career of Andy Cohen, the New York Giant second-baseman in the 1920's, the man who succeeded, for a few years, the great immortal Rogers Hornsby, and who was one of the first Jewish players to hit the big time.

Andy is now the manager of the Indianapolis (American Association) club.

During spring training, some of the reporters talked with him about old times.

OF COURSE, they reviewed Andy's career, but of some interest, apart from the statistics, is what Andy said about the men who managed him. "I played under three wonderful managers during my active career," he stated. "McGraw, Tris Speaker and Donie Bush. They were all great baseball men, and I profited tremendously by their teachings.

"As far as McGraw was concerned, you either liked him or hated him. There was no in-between. He was a hard loser, but certainly not a poor loser. I, personally, loved the guy." Which is rather remarkable, for Andy was let go by the Giants when he sported a batting average of .294—rather good at any time.
