Parents, Not Bias, Keep Jews Out Of Baseball

MINNEAPOLIS, (JTA)—Racial and religious prejudice is "alien to the baseball diamond" and it is parental objections and not bias which are responsible for the relative lack of Jewish players in professional baseball.

That's the opinion of Andy Cohen, who for nine seasons was a favorite of Minneapolis ball fans as the talented second baseman of the Minneapolis Millers. Now living in El Paso, Texas, Cohen revisited Minneapolis as the guest of honor at the 13th annual Baseball Boosters Dinner.

Cohen, who played with the New York Giants, is returning to the major leagues this season as an infield coach with the Philadelphia Phillies. He said that he had never encountered as much as a wisecrack about his Jewishness in 30 years of association with the sport.

"An athlete's ability, not his race, color or religion, is the factor that counts in baseball," he said. "A racing fast ball, not racism, wins ball games."

Jewish parents, he contended, "frown on their sons going into baseball" and encourage them to enter business and the professions instead.

"Jewish parents, not the sport, have closed the door to increased numbers of Jewish athletes playing professional ball."
