Thirty minutes before game time Friday, Kal Segrist learned from Chuck Brayton, the Washington State coach who is chairman of the baseball rules committee of the NCAA, that the "suspended" game down in El Paso could only be made up if played from the start.

Segrist and university of Texas-El Paso's Andy Cohen decided against putting a third game on Friday because of the cold and expected colder weather due later in the day.

Then what happened? You guessed it, the teams still played 21 innings. Texas Tech won the opener 1-0 in 10 innings thanks to a Miner error and UTEP came back to score twice in the seventh frame of the nightcap and win in 11 innings 4-3.

The teams will play another twin bill today at 1 p.m.

Despite the fact he did not receive the victory in the opener, Red Raider freshman David Runkle will go down in the Tech record books as throwing a no-hitter.

As both games were scheduled for seven innings, the SWC recognizes any no-hitter of that duration, even if a pitcher later loses the gem before the game ends.

Runkle actually pitched 8½ frames of hitless ball and departed with the bases loaded and one out in the 10th, having
