

Bases loaded with Pelicans in the seventh. None out. Barons four runs ahead.

A sharp grounder cut to the Alabama native (that Mobile birthplace, Brooklyn George can't live down). . . . He dug 'er up, stepped on third for a force and threw on to first to complete a double play.

The stands buzzed. . . . First impression: Wasn't that a boner? Why no cutting off of a run at home?

It was not. It looked good at the time. It looked even more so upon consultation with the bossman. No doubt in his mind. Ask him.

"Prigge made the right play. And I was happy to get out of that inning with only one run.

"The way he played it was a sure double play. If he'd come to the plate after making his force, he had to get his throw around the runner from a bad angle, and Danny (Ryan) had to make the tag. A lot of things could have happened.

"You don't like to give away a run, ever. But when you've four ahead, you go for the sure thing and let one run go. He played it exactly right."

For a fact, there wasn't much that wasn't "exactly right" about Sunday afternoon's Birmingham Baron performance which sent old friend Andy Cohen and his Pelicans gloomily on their way.

Like the departing customer analyzed: "It's so much better when you win."

*A fact of baseball life, there, which cannot be denied.
See you at the ball game.*
