

The late Dumb Dan Morgan used to tell this fight story:
 "I was a matchmaker for a small club many years ago and signed up a kid to take on an oldtimer . . . In the first round the veteran poked the kid in the mouth with several stiff ones, and the kid signaled the referee to call a halt . . . Then he felt around the side of his mouth, walked over to me and asked, 'Mr. Morgan, how much am I getting for this fight?' I told him about $15. He thought about it for a second and said, 'Well, I ain't gonna fight any more . . . Mr. Morgan, I've already swallowed two gold teeth that cost me five bucks each and I've got a $50 bridge in my mouth . . . This guy will knock it out, sure, and it ain't good business just to get $15 back' . . . So I couldn't blame him for quitting when he was five bucks ahead."

Andy Cohen, the New Orleans manager, has quite a reputation as an after-dinner wit . . . But he hasn't talked the Southern League umpires out of much . . . The New Orleans club has a financial problem again this year that can be solved only by whopping crowds . . . And people around New Orleans believe they'll materialize.
