CALLS 'EM

"I'VE BEEN WAITING a long time . . . I'll just keep on waiting . . . I know I'm being considered for this job . . . There's nothing I can do but sit back and wait."

That was the reaction of one of the greatest managers in Indianapolis baseball history, Kerby Farrell, yesterday when he learned that he had been replaced as manager of the Tribe by Andy Cohen.

The job which Farrell was talking about, of course, is piloting the Cleveland Indians.

Every Indianapolis baseball fan will be heartsick to see the man who has brought this city two pennants in three years leave us, but who can blame Farrell for biding his time and taking a gamble on grabbing the "brass ring" of a big-league managerial post?

And, you can't blame the front offices of either Indianapolis or the Chicago White Sox, either, since there is a big rebuilding job to do here and we must have a skipper in order to get started.

The "pinch" into which Indians Inc. and the White Sox—to say nothing of Farrell, himself—were put is an unfortunate one. If anyone is to blame for it, the finger must point to Hank Greenberg and the dilly-dallying Cleveland management for failing to make up their minds whether or not they want Farrell.

COULD FARRELL be left "high and dry" without any managing job at all as a result of this strange situation? It's not inconceivable, though it is most unlikely.

If Farrell doesn't get the Cleveland post, most baseball observers believe he will wind up at San Diego in the Pacific Coast League, where he would manage a ball club built around the nucleus of the same group which he managed here this year.

But, as Farrell himself pointed out yesterday, that is by no means a certainty, because San Diego still has a manager, Bob Elliott.

Kerby refused to find fault with President Ownie Bush or others of the Indianapolis management for replacing him at this time. "It's all right," said Farrell from his home in Henderson, Tenn. "What the heck. They had to have a manager there right away. I want the Cleveland job and as long as I've still got a chance for it, that's it."

Farrell lauded his successor, saying "You've got a good man in that Cohen."

All loyal Indianapolis fans will wish Cohen every success in his managerial career at Victory Field.

But he will have awfully big shoes to fill—ones that have been worn lately by such men as Al Lopez and Birdie Tebbets and Kerby Farrell.

HOW FLEETING is fame? Ray Nitschke, junior full-back, was named as the outstanding Illinois player of the game when the Illini tied Purdue 7-7 last Saturday. So what happens? Nitschke loses

EVER HEAR of Charley Burley of Lloyd Marshall or Eddie Booker or Jack Chase or Holman Williams?

Neither had we until we interviewed Archie Moore when he was passing through our town a couple of years ago. Archie named them as among the best fighters he ever encountered and said they were "the champions who should have been."

Now, Archie says in one of his not infrequent press releases that he is going to beat Floyd Patterson on Nov. 30 for those obscure boxers.

"These fellows are the champions that should have been but weren't," says Archie. "They had the ability, the guts and the savvy, but they didn't have the breaks."

"Keep this in mind when I tell you what this fight means to me. It means I'll be striking a blow for Burley and Marshall and Booker and Chase and Williams. Men who were frozen out. I fought all of them. I know just how good they were."

Just about everybody who has analyzed Michigan State's football success this season has spoken of the Spartan's great depth.

Now, Coach Duffy Daugherty has given his own version in his usual wise-cracking manner: "Squad depth is the number of players a coach is willing to take a chance on in a game."

STEVE GABER, who vied with the Chiefs' Roger Hayfield for "smallest player" honors in the International Hockey League, has been released by the Troy Bruins.

Gaber was the last member of the original Bruins hockey club still playing on the team. He joined it in October, 1950, and missed only three scheduled games in six years. During that time, he scored 264 goals. But he had found it increasingly difficult to keep up with the pace of IHL hockey and had scored but two goals in 11 games this year. Last season he tallied 33 goals and 36 assists for a total of 69 points during the 59 games.

RON KRAMER, Michigan's great end who was instrumental in disposing of Iowa for the second straight year last Saturday, makes a case for rough football in the current edition of Collier's magazine.

Kramer is quoted at length by Writer Bill Fay in his extremely realistic viewpoint of the sport. Here are some samples of Kramerian philosophy:

On rough football—"The real good teams don't try to
