BASEBALL FANS won't meet Indianapolis' new manager, Andy Cohen, until some time in February, but here's a characteristic incident offered as an introduction.

Twenty years ago Cohen was second-basing for the Minneapolis Millers when the Millers, managed by Ownie Bush, trampled other league teams with such triple-A favorites as Joe Hauser, Buzz Arlett, Fabian Gaffke and Walt Tauscher.

At that time Jimmy Theofanis was hawking the Indianapolis Star at the Claypool Hotel corner. Cohen, a Jew, and Theofanis, a little Greek kid, became close friends. Cohen was Jimmy's hero and the hero saw that Jimmy got in free to Miller games at Perry Stadium and was introduced to all the Miller players.

One night during a pouring rain, Cohen purchased all of Jimmy's newspapers on the promise that Jimmy would go home so he wouldn't catch a cold. Andy gave a dollar and never took the papers.

Jimmy now lives in Rochester, N.Y., and he writes back, "He (Cohen) was a wonderful man and I'm sure that the years of experience behind him will make him a tremendous inspirational leader for youngsters. They in turn will respect and admire him for his eagerness to help them and last but not least for his sincerity and loyalty."
