

Stems From Brawl; Hurler Was Warned

By Special Correspondent

CLEARWATER, Fla., March 30.—An angry Jim Owens quit the Phillies today because of a $500 fine assessed by Owner Bob Carpenter for a brawl in a Clearwater bar.

The big pitcher, 26, said he was leaving for his Gifford, Pa., home. He won 12 and lost 12 for the Phillies last season.

"That's the only thing I can do," he said. "They'll either have to trade me or I'll go find a job."

Owens was involved in a fight with a patron several weeks ago over remarks passed in a bar. He said he understood he had been fined $100 for his part in the after hours brawl.

Teammates Joe Koppe and B. G. Smith also were assessed $100 each. Owens, however, was socked with an additional $500 levy by Carpenter.

"The other guys were fined $100," Owens said. "Eddie Sawyer (club manager) investigated and agreed we only broke the curfew and were not entirely at fault for the fight. So they wound up with a $100 fine and it cost me $600."

The pitcher said that when he signed his 1960 contract with Carpenter, he was warned to stay out of trouble and that if he didn't, he would be fined $500.

"The agreement was that I would be fined if any trouble was my fault," Owens said. "But this wasn't my fault. I was out after hours and I expected to be fined but not that much."

Owens said he told Carpenter last night that at the start of the fight he was punched in the mouth.

"What would you do?" he said he asked the owner.

"I'd walk away," Carpenter replied.

"Like hell you would," Owens said he retorted.
