

CULLUM'S COLUMN by Dick Cullum

Anyone Have Long Memory?

WHO REMEMBERS THAT STRING OF games the Minneapolis Millers of another day played without being shut out?

It is not in the book and even such well-stocked baseball minds as Halsey Hall, Tom Briere and Bob Beebe cannot recall.

There is no doubt about the record in this league being held by Kansas City which, from 1921 to 1923, went an incredible 238 consecutive games without being shut out. That took the combined efforts of Bunny Brief, Beals

Becker, Wilbur Good, Dutch Zwilling and their playmates.

The figure which comes to mind for the Millers' games without being shut out is 185.

Beebe recalls that it was more than one full season, and might have been 185.

Spencer Harris, who was the center fielder in that period, is vague on the figure.

He recalls Babe Ganzel, Ernie Smith, Joe Mowry, Harry Rice, Andy Cohen and Joe Hauser co-operated.

"We could get the runs, all right," he said, and it is recalled that Harris was just about the best left-handed hitter against left-handed pitching the league ever had.

Well, it's only a subject of casual conversation which keeps us from thinking too much about the grim drive the Millers are making these days for the other end of the record — that for being shut out most times in a season.

NO THANK YOU

HERE IS AN INCIDENT WHICH GIVES rise to many questions, first of which is, "Do you take us for complete suckers in this town?"

A suggestion for a fight between Del Flanagan, St. Paul, and Virgil Akins, St. Louis, was made to Minneapolis matchmaker Tommy Anderson.

The suggestion came from Bernie Glickman of Chicago who is manager of Flanagan and half owner of Akins' contract.

The cost would be $10,000 for Akins. No television is involved.

Glickman would sell Flanagan's contract to Flanagan's friend, Mike Welch of St. Paul, a boxing fan.

Welch would manage Del for this fight. He is not a professional manager, is in no way connected with boxing, excepting as a ticket buyer, and has a thriving contracting business.

WHY HERE?

ANDERSON AND HIS PARTNERS, Wally Karbo and Dennis Stecher, turned down the proposal.

Here are some of the questions which come to mind:

Inasmuch as this would be a hard fight to sell in Minneapolis, where Flanagan is in disfavor, why doesn't Glickman take it to Flanagan's home town, St. Paul, where it would do very well, or to Akins' home town, St. Louis, where it would do much better than in Minneapolis?

Why isn't the fight offered on television, when TV is so short of attractions?

What boxing commission would take the transfer of Flanagan's contract from Glickman to businessman Welch, as anything but a one-fight cover-up to evade the rule that one man cannot manage both fighters?

How could the fight be signed while Flanagan is in the process of changing managers; and if Welch wants to buy Flanagan's contract, why doesn't he go ahead and buy it without waiting to see whether this particular fight is signed?

CALIFORNIA FOR CALIFORNIANS

ISAAK LOGART WON THE FIRST TWO minutes, or a little more, of each round in Los Angeles last night. Don Jordan sometimes won the third minute or a little less.

This, plus the noisy support of a noisy crowd, induced the officials to give Jordan a split decision.

We get some weird decisions these days, don't we?
