

Public Concern Needed

El Paso has a thriving downtown, and private interests have dotted the city with handsome new structures, but there is no reason for complacency so long as the city also contains depressed and blighted areas, the Beautify El Paso Assn., was told last night.

Addressing the association meeting at El Paso Public Library, Robert W. Lee, Herald-Post editor, said blighted sections of the city are not the private problems of those who live there, but represent public problems of poverty, education and need for job training to raise low level income families to the point where they can afford better housing.

Those problems cannot be met unless citizens become concerned, he said, and there is evidence in the failure of some community projects to meet their goals that sufficient concern does not exist.

Andy Cohen, president of the Assn., presided at the meeting, at which Mrs. George Kistmacher reported on the Beautify With Catci program, co-sponsored this summer by the association and The El Paso Times, and the present landscaping program sponsored by the association, The Herald-Post and the Public Service Board.
