TAYLOR SPINK suggests editorially in this week's Sporting News that a pitcher from each league be named annually for the Cy Young Memorial award. It's a good idea and a pertinent argument that Spink might have included is the fact that only two major league cities—New York and Chicago—now have clubs in both leagues. And six of the BBWA committee members in each circuit do not see teams in the other league. . . . Andy Cohen's appointment as manager of the Indianapolis club jogs the memory. . . . Andy was the Giant second baseman after John McGraw traded Rogers Hornsby to the Boston Braves. . . . Andy got off to a good start at bat and the New York papers each day printed the averages of Cohen and Hornsby. . . . Early in the season Andy was a world-beater at the plate. Hornsby's reaction was characteristic. "I feel sorry for that poor kid," the Rajah said. "It won't be fair to him to print those averages very long." . . . American Medical researchers report experiments that tend to show that "warming up does not improve athletic performance." The trouble is the A.M.A. boys tested track athletes. . . . And the better sprinters, not warming up, made better times than inferior sprinters who had warmed up. And there was no difference in the performances of the same men, warmed-up or not. . . . But don't try to sell that no warm-up business to baseball-pitchers, infielders or outfielders. . . . We haven't heard lately what Bobby Del Greco, whose early batting in the Cuban League was so impressive, is hitting now. Last time we looked the low man in the top ten was hitting .270 and Bobby wasn't in the group. But why do people bring up things like that?
