

Thinking out loud

Super stars?

EDITOR: I am glad I read what a sportswriter from the morning newspaper wrote about two super-stars that played baseball with UTEP.

Now we know why Coach Andy Cohen never had a winning team or a winning season. No coach in this world can possibly win if he has to put up with one wet-nose super-star, let alone two or three.

Here are two prima-donnas, just out of high school and junior college (big deal) telling this sportswriter that Cohen was a lousy coach. A fine coach with more than 40 years of baseball know-how.

These super-stars will never reach the minors, much less the majors with that know-it-all attitude and their narrow minds.

They will always be fighting their tails off against their coaches and never against their opponents.

Who, in his right mind, can tell others that the coach is wrong and not follow his instructions, his teaching? These two super-star stars have to learn to obey, concentrate and respect their parents, teachers, coaches and later their bosses.

I am sure these two super-stars will never amount to anything. How can they, knowing more than Cohen, a man that spend forty years in baseball and knows that there is still lots to learn?

Larry McFarlin is a fine young coach and I already feel sorry for him. He will remember that article written about these two super-stars, I am sure and he will be in the same boat Andy Cohen was for twenty years as a coach.

His (Larry's) downfall will be from within, if he tolerates the wet-nose super-stars, like Andy did.

Cohen played and coached in the minors and major leagues for forty years and won the respect of lot of people for all these and for his true and loyal heart he has.

I wish I could live long enough to see if these two super-stars can match that. — Lionel Forti, Box 26631.
