

'Shanty' Hogan Loved Steak Played Vaudeville in City

Man mountain Francis "Shanty" Hogan who caught for the New York Giants, ate steak at breakfast, and played winter vaudeville in Scranton with his Hebrew teammate Andy Cohen, is dead at 61, reviving memories of the late 20s and early 30s when the huge New Englander was at the peak of his popularity.

Hogan and Cohen came here on a week-long schedule and drew almost as many fans when "Shanty" sat down to eat as they did with their cleverly written skit, containing parodies of popular songs.

Sentimental as he was massive Hogan insisted on visiting the Cathedral Cemetery, Moscow, resting place of the late Hugh Jennings. It was zeroish cold, and the snowbanks were almost forboding, yet they went and bareheaded Hogan recited a prayer for the Hall of Fame member he knew as a Giants' coach in his first year after being traded by the Boston Braves.

A visit to "Shanty's" Somerville, Mass., home was equally as rewarding. There his angelic mother always had the steak and eggs her James Francis loved after arising.

It was the same story wherever Hogan played during 13 major league seasons. He had the best batting average at the table, and always knew where they served the finest, and biggest platters of porterhouse, filet mignon and such.

The Great Umpire called Hogan out at Faulkner Hospital, Boston.