'As I Was Saying ...'

Miller "Lowlife"

WESTERN ATHLETIC CONFERENCE football players named Miller this week were almost as unlucky as the man who steered the Titanic into an iceberg. Willie Miller, Colorado State's gifted wide receiver, received a hypertension of the elbow which may keep him out of the Rams' first game that will be played next Saturday against New Mexico. Jay Miller, Brigham Young's super pass catcher, got an even worse injury — a broken shoulder blade. The medical term is "transverse fracture of the right scapula." He's likely to miss the first three BYU games. Joe Watts of the Provo, Utah, Herald, may have made newspaper history by running pictures of Miller's X-rays. Other Millers in the news this week, Dick and Mark, were more fortunate. Dick, former Sun Kings' business manager and radio broadcaster, has returned to El Paso from Scottsdale, Ariz., where he managed a radio station. His son Mark, who played second base for the UTEP Miners last season, has signed a contract with the Texas Rangers and probably will be assigned to Gastonia in the Eastern Carolina League next spring. Andy Cohen of UTEP has lost a good infielder. Golfer after an 18-hole match: "I lost four balls and three friends." A popular name for UTEP's football team in the pass-minded days of Bobby Dobbs was "Flying Miners." John Mooney in the 1974 NCAA Football Guide calls them the "Trying Miners." Football teams, one man says, have always had the triple option: Win, lose or draw.
