

Editor's Corner —:— By R. W. Lee

What with the football season just around the corner, my bride and I repaired to Dudley Field the other night to pay our respects to the Sun Kings, before they draw their last breath of the season.

It was a double-header, and the evening started inauspiciously, with the Dallas-Fort Worth Spurs getting a three run jump in the first inning of the first game, and adding three more in succeeding innings to come out on the long end of a 6-3 score.

So far as that first game was concerned, the greatest pleasure consisted of sitting in the afterglow of the setting sun and watching the sky turn from pale blue to deepest black, and the Franklin Mountains lose their mass and shape and become a black cardboard silhouette against the fading light.

THE SECOND GAME was more appetizing from an El Paso point of view. With two aboard in the first inning, Jim Spencer walloped a low outside pitch over the wall just left of center field, and galloped around the bases, herding his teammates ahead of him.

The Kings nursed those three runs to the third inning, when they added another, and wound up winners by a 4-3 score.

As always, it was pleasant to watch our guys win, but also as usual much of the fun wasn't connected with the scoring plays.

Out by third base, when the Kings were at bat, Mr. Rocky Bridges, the Kings' manager, seemed frozen with a permanent pain in his stomach. His stance for the night was one in which he bent over, hands on knees, and watched the action with an impassive expression.

When he finally stood erect and turned toward the plate (behind and to the right of which we sat) it could be seen that his right jaw was bulging with a massive wad of bubble gum or some such thing.

This lopsided appearance led Mr. H. D. Fulwiler, seated with us, to a discussion of several chipmunks he knows personally up in Colorado. By no means did he imply that Mr. Bridges was a chipmunk; he merely commented on the ability of man and beast alike to stretch cheek muscles. I know very few chipmunks personally, but will lay odds on Mr. Bridges to outstretch them, jaws down.

THE HIGH POINT of the evening was reached mid-way in the first game when the Dallas-Fort Worth folks found themselves with two men on third base. This happened when runners on second and third attempted to advance. The man on second did fine. He zoomed into third base standing up. The man on third meanwhile was halfway home when the ball suddenly plopped into the mitt of Sun Kings catcher Jim Hibbs, who rushed to meet the oncoming runner. The runner had no choice but to retreat to third, where he found himself sharing the bag with his teammate.

Mr. Hibbs tagged him, but the umpire made no sign. So Mr. Hibbs tagged the other player, who was declared out.

At this point Mr. Bridges stirred himself for a quiet discussion with the umpire, asking, I guess, how come the man who was tagged first wasn't out? I couldn't hear what the umpire said, nor what Mr. Bridges said, but I definitely could hear Mr. Andy Cohen, who stood on the Kings' dugout steps and shouted "The — he didn't tag him."

As usual, where umpires are concerned, this cut no ice, but it did relieve Mr. Cohen's feelings, and I believe he went home happy.

So did we.
