MAUCH SOLD ON YOUNGSTERS

Phils' 'Kid' Experiment Includes Players, Pilot

(Last of three-part series)

Gene Mauch is the rookie manager of a National league baseball team which has cast its lot with rookie players. That is the Philadelphia story. But it was a deliberate move. A year ago the veterans finished in last place.

So the gamble has been a calculated risk.

Mauch moved into the situation after the second game of the league season. He had missed the Phils spring training. His position was doubly rough.

"First, I've had to gain the players' confidence—to show them that I know baseball," he said. He has—talking to both players and coach Andy Cohen.

"Now it is part of my job to convince the players that I don't expect super-human efforts from them. They've got to gain the needed experience in the majors sometime," he explained.

The big problem right now is that "everyone is trying too hard. They're in the majors and they are busting buttons to stay."

Mauch has refrained from criticizing his players, in spite of mental and physical errors. The Phils have not been getting beat so much as they have been beating themselves.

"What I hope we can have is a team with speed, a good defense and pitching. . . . Something like my Minneapolis team. Hitting rates below the other three points," he vowed.

Mauch, known in the minors for his ability to get the best out of young pitchers, is "sold" on his crop of youngsters. But his biggest problem is a veteran catcher.

Rookies Jim Coker and Clay Dalrymple behind the plate can not replace, by spirit and willingness, the sure arm and working knowledge about opposing players of a veteran receiver.

Mauch has only Al Dark at third and outfielders Harry Anderson and Wally Post switching off as veterans. The remainder are first and second-year men.

"I wish I had six other Darks," he remarked, talking about the cooperation he has received from a man who is managerial timber himself. "And the same goes for (veteran hurler) Robin Roberts," he added.

So far Philadelphia has played but four of the seven other National league teams. "We're all learning the league," Mauch remarked.

No one goes with a loser very long, but to the credit of the Philadelphia management it has not pressed the "panic button." It is trying to maneuver a few trades; yet it doesn't intend to lose those players on whom it pins its future.

If Philadelphia fans and management have the patience, the "kid" experiment could change the pattern of major league baseball. . . . The "kids" will be writing the ticket for other rookies of the future.
