

The Wichita Eagle 5B

Thursday Morning, August 29, 1957

version is that the Dodgers are crossing up the Giants and won't go west. The Giants, according to Fox, will be left holding the sack and the National League won't let 'em go out west, alone. So, the Giants, all done in New York would move into Minneapolis, letting Louisville have the Millers.

However, what that wouldn't do to the Association is better to pass over quickly. Once Minneapolis gets big league ball, St. Paul is all done. It will try to do a Jersey City act while landing 10 or 12 big league games for its own new field, but certainly it will not try to match Triple A with major league ball 12 miles and 20 cents away.

We prefer to believe the Campbell plan, and Campbell can't see the dream of Seattle and Portland getting into the Association with such as Louisville and Indianapolis, 2,500 miles away. "That would be pretty steep financially, wouldn't it?" the Louisville general manager said.

He did see, however, certain consolidations of leagues in a year or two. "I think the Southern and Texas may combine eventually into a ten-club circuit," he stated.

The Atlanta Situation

Andy Cohen, the Indianapolis manager whom we ran into for a few minutes when the Indians and Braves traded towns at Minneapolis, was asked about Atlanta getting into the International League. "That won't ever happen as long as Atlanta prohibits the use of colored players. You can't draw the line in Triple A ball," Cohen stated.

Miami, by the way, isn't doing nearly as well as Milwaukee figured it would when it tried to move the Toledo club there. Someone reminded that Miami is strictly a winter's tourist place and the summer visitors are not baseball fans.

Louisville has another hope. If the Coast league collapses there will be a Chicago Cub affiliation available. Cleveland has expressed some interest in Louisville.

The Kentucky city has been hard hit. Joe Macko is out for the season. Louisville has gone down, not up, in the percentage tables although the Colonels may draw 130,000, with a frankly "gosh awful" Triple A club. But the players have never quit battling, and the fans have appreciated their willingness against well-stocked clubs out of the Colonels' class.

Louisville bids fair to finish with the lowest percentage of its many years in the Association, and it was a founding member.

Surely the city is entitled to better baseball next year, but of course not at the expense of Wichita. But a city which can turn out 130,000 fans to see the current "collapsible Colonels" deserves some sort of medal.

However, Louisville has its worries, aside from baseball.

It has, at present, 17,500 unemployed and the number is growing. Unemployed folks may like baseball, but how can they pay to get in?

It is something Milwaukee would be sure to think about, if someone mentioned moving the Braves out of Kansas.

Boots and Bingles

Young Charley "Boybe" Hendley who may pitch in the stream of doubleheaders starting Friday, worked five innings against the Fort McPherson team, which was almost entirely former pro league, and blanked the soldiers. He feels he might do all right. He hasn't been told as yet that he will start a game. It might not happen, but the Ben Geraghty-Ted Wilks plans seem to call for it. — The Chicago News, in a baseball roundup column, says Joe Jay is the most improved pitcher in the minors and that he's sure to go to Milwaukee "right soon." — The News also quotes Bobby Bragan, former Pirate manager as saying Dick Cole is managerial material, along with Gene Mauch and Dick Groat.
