

There are, in retrospect, and second guessing a dozen ways Wichita could and should have won the second game. Once was by selection of either Claude Raymond or Red Murff as relievers. Both did right well—but too late.

The Braves had a glowing chance in the ninth, loading the sacks with but one out on two hits and Lee Maye's long fly up against the right field fence which George Wilson could not hold.

Juan Pizarro was sent up to pinch hit and Manager Andy Cohen countered with his fourth pitchers, Jack McMahan. Juan promptly hit an easy bounder to third, a double play resulted and the game was over.

The Braves open Omaha's season in the Nebraska city on Tuesday night, and then go to Denver for a series before returning here on April 29 to play the strong St. Paul and Minneapolis entries.

The Braves may have some pitching help by then.
