

THE MORNING AFTER by pete lightning

San Francisco's new Candlestick Park has 30,000 heated seats. The Frisco climate is cool, even in the thick of the summer, due to the breezes off the bay. Judging from the ball games played on the Coast Thursday night, and one in far off Philly, the fans need some heated seats, as well as hot, hot dogs and one of those cute little jugs one can slip in a pocket. No less than half of the four National games went over three full hours that day, and night.

Three hours is too long to sit in a cold ball park at night, a lot of fans will say. They will suffer TWO hours in a night (or daytime) fall football game, but they're up and down, they are enclosed in a big rug, a camel's back coat, a camel can be found, and they are NOT facing a north wind as a baseball fan is.

Both of the 3-hour ball games were low score affairs. Neither was a 15 to 13 football type game. Yet, they dragged, not being there, only at a radio, the chill wasn't felt here, but the time element was. Who wants to sit up until ONE A.M. to hear how a ball game came out? Well, a few will, including your reporter, and then perhaps regret it.

Take the game at Los Angeles. KPH had it, and Harry Caray did his usual vivid work, aided by Joe the Sage.

The Cardinals lost it by being too free with material. Had they had but 15 ball players instead of 25, St. Louis, not Los Angeles, would have won. How's that? Very simple, listen:

In the last of the ninth, the Cards were leading 2 to 1. First batter, Essegian, pinch hitter (we can recall his world series homer as a pinch batter), singled. Next chap up was Hodges. He sent a line drive to center and Curt Flood misjudged it, at least Harry avers so. Instead of an out, it was a triple, score tied, winning run on third. "Flood was sent in for defensive purposes," was the explanation.

He should have stayed right where he was, on the bench. A catch would probably have saved the game for the Cards as the next batter popped up. That would have been two out, and a harmless man on first. But as it was, a wild pitch by a pitcher no one ever heard of ended the game in a face-flat manner.

What with the Joe Koppe the Ex-Wichita shortstop producing the winning hit for Andy Cohen, the former Denver Manager, and with Gene Mauch, the former "boy manager" of the Millers coming in to boss, it was an "Association Day" in Philadelphia. Glad to see Joe Making it so nicely. He has it coming.

Parking Fee Six Bits
Getting back to Candlestick Park, the parking area holds 8,000 autos but not for free. The parking fee is 75 cents a car which makes Wichita U's bite look like a small one.

Remember when a fan could get into a game in Wichita for TWO bits, and see very expert League ball, in the Iobell regime? Now a parking fee is three times as high.

In fact this reporter while a summer student at Chicago U. watched the greats, Sisk, Cobb, Walter Johnson, Schalk, Jackson, Felsch, Hal Chase and many others, just for four bits.

But the bleacher days are over. Candlestick Park seats 43,765 and has a huge 11,000 box seats. In other words, bleacher fans used to outnumber the grandstands patrons and only a few aristocrats sat in the boxes. Now there are no bleachers left in all the new parks, and when a fan goes to a ball game he wants only the best.

The city of San Francisco put out $14,855,990 on Candlestick Park and there wasn't enough money left for the Giants office, or stadium club, a fancy place to get a meal, and a drink.

Few Kansans will ever see Candlestick personally, but they will by TV. It's a great invention, except of course when a fan has the urge for LIVE baseball. Then he doesn't find it, locally.

Perez to Risk Title Tonight

Flyweight King Faces Kingpetch

BANGKOK (AP) — World flyweight champion Pascual Perez of Argentina is heavily favored to retain his title Saturday night against Thailand's Pone Kingpetch in a match that is expected to draw 30,000 fans.

"I'm going all out for a knockout," said the 34-year-old champion who has been fighting as a pro since 1952. "I'll definitely win."

Perez will be making the 11th defense of the title he won in 1954 by outpointing Yoshio Shirai of Japan in Tokyo. In six other so-called non-title bouts in Buenos Aires, his title actually was at stake because he and his opponents were under the 112-pound class limit.

The champion is a little man with a big punch. He has knocked out 36 while compiling a 52-1-1 pro record.
