Andy Cohn Gets A New Job

Andy Cohn, whose baseball career is remembered by old-timers and sports historians, has come into the forefront of the sports news again. Hank Greenberg, general manager of the Cleveland Indians, has named Andy as manager of the Cleveland farm club in Indianapolis in the American Association. The Jewish star of a past era is now 51 years old and has a pretty long managerial history. The past two seasons he led the New Orleans Pelicans; before that he won pennants with Denver in the Western League and Eau Claire in the Northern League.

Yet it happens that Andy Cohen was the leading Jewish baseball player of his time, in the late 1920's, and he played the same role among Jews in baseball that Jackie Robinson did for Negroes. His career was short, brilliant, with tragic edges, and, in the long run, he did more for the Jews in the diamond game than nearly anyone else. In "The Jew in American Sports," a book by this columnist, there is a complete account of Cohen's career. It captures the essence of baseball; it has unexpected twists, drama and continuous interest. Now, as a manager, Andy Cohen can come back. We will watch him with real interest.

New Israeli Athletes to Tour

The impressive showing of Israel's soccer players, plus the withdrawal of Israel's basketball team from the Olympic Games has resulted in the exciting prospect of America's seeing Israel's national basketball team beginning in January. The team was trained by Elmer Ripley, whose comments about Israel and the hoop game in the Jewish Republic have gained national attention. It is a good squad, notable for slick ball-handling, if not spectacular shooting by overlarge men. The team will play in New York, opening at Madison Square Garden, in Boston, in Baltimore, in Detroit, in Pittsburgh and in St. Louis, Chicago and San Francisco. The stars will play a total of ten games in five weeks. Basketball once was an American sport, invented by an American.

Kosher Food at Melbourne

Lots have been written about the Olympics, but few have commented on the fact that Jewish athletes were able to observe kashrut, if they wanted to. A special kitchen under the religious supervision of the Melbourne Beth Din was installed at Heidelberg village, where the teams lived during the competition. The Olympic Housing and Catering Committee cooperated fully in seeing to it that kosher food was made available to the athletes. Not a major story, true; but a heartening one and indicative of the thoughtfulness of the men who organized the Games.

Delayed Match

America's most brilliant exponent of the art of chess, studious and pious Sammy Reshevsky, will not get a chance to show his talents in Moscow in December, after all. Fresh from a victory in the Lessing J. Rosenwald chess tournament—which he won handily—Sammy discovered that "unsettled conditions" have cancelled his match with David Bronstein. The decision was made by Reshevsky's manager Alexander Bisno, who spoke for the American Chess Foundation, which backed the trip of the American chess team to Russia last year. Once again, Reshevsky is being blocked from revealing his superiority over any
