SPUTTERINGS

By WALTER L. JOHNS

THE ANNUAL managerial toll in the majors already has reached eerie proportions and 1960 probably will be chronicled in the baseball books as one of the craziest ever.

We've still got more than a month to go and more heads probably will be sliced off before the next campaign rolls around, especially on teams which figured to win the pennant and aren't doing that.

The looney baseball year hadn't even got into full swing when we had a strange one in Philadelphia where the scholarly Eddie Sawyer, serving his second time-around as manager of the Phils, just up and quit and was replaced by Gene Mauch from Minneapolis. And, in between, Andy Cohen, a coach, took over as manager.

If that wasn't strange enough, we had the shift at Chicago, where Charlie Grimm, not so jolly anymore, exchanged jobs with Lou Boudreau, baseball announcer and former big league manager.

Going east to Boston we had Bill Jurgens managing the Red Sox, after he had replaced Mike Higgins. So what happened here? You know, of course, for Higgins replaced Jurgens.

More was still to come.

Out on the west coast, Bill Rigney was going fine as manager of the Giants. But when the Giants began to lose games, another 1960 dandy came up when Rigney was dropped and a front-office oldster, Tom Sheehan, took over as man-
