

Twisox Climax Opening Week With Peppy Drills

soon what he'll have—at least, he figures he'll soon have a general line on the club to be taken north. With the parent Chicago White Sox required to cut their roster earlier this year, the effects are being felt all down the line—and it's reasonable to assume that Duluth-Superior will have an earlier jump on its formation than has been possible previously.

Meanwhile, Hauser continues to work with what he has and keep a sharp eye on possible candidates scattered around on other rosters. Yesterday morning's drill, under clear skies but in relatively cool temperatures, again spotlighted details on certain fundamentals.

Pitchers were given an exhausting session on covering first base when ground balls are hit to the right side of the infield. And while the chuckers were breakings off the hill for the bag, outfielders were acting as base-runners, digging from home to first individually as each ball was hit by a coach.

Over in the sliding pit, Johnny Mostil had the infielders and catchers eating sawdust in a rugged sliding session. Among the players, this is one of the least liked chores that each spring brings. It's dirty, sweaty work, and in no way resembles the fun that batting, throwing or fielding baseballs can be.

Then followed a 45-minute batting drill for all but pitchers. The latter, when not taking their turn on the mound, were in the batting cage, facing "Iron Mike" in a bunting session.

The peppy infield practice wound up the day's work. Even the instructors and managers were a little on the tired side after this one.
