Have we got a bomb
for you!

Here it is folks, the newest in death technology—the Neutron Bomb. That's right! The space age has now been expanded into our nation's most productive industry—killing people.

This up-to-date bomb is the latest in the U.S.'s arsenal of "clean kill" weapons.

When tested against Brand-X hydrogen bomb the results were amazing.

The old H-bomb killed all wildlife and living creatures within a 10-square-mile radius and leveled all the buildings within that area. What a mess!

But the ultramodern Neutron Bomb, when dropped in a similarly constructed area, killed all living creatures with only a minimum amount of damage to surrounding buildings. With his last dying words, farmer Delong claimed the concussion from the bomb cracked the new toilet bowl in his outhouse.

Not only did it save the physical surroundings for future generations but deaths were prolonged. Persons centrally located died immediately, but for those near the outskirts of the blast area death took up to one week. During this time, individual suffering was increased, making the bomb even more attractive to our military industrial complex.

Another outstanding feature of the bomb is its size. It can be carried in some of our smallest nuclear submarines.

Although the cost of production seems a bit high, the savings in property damage makes this bomb the best dollar value in our military arsenal.

In beckoning your support of the Neutron Bomb, I must emphasize that it will be constructed in the United States of America by Americans.

Making a living...

Editor:

In the July 28 issue of The Prospector, Dean Thomas Lee was quoted as saying, "Students are more serious about their educations (now) than they were during the Vietnam War era with the emphasis shifting from world problems to 'How do I make a living?'"

As one who has been a student both during the Vietnam War era and now, I feel that his words require some commentary.

In the first place, Dean Lee seems to confuse education with training. The question "How do I make a living?" is a question about training—the acquisition of marketable skills. It does not take a philosopher to point out that education involves other questions as well, one of the most important being about how to solve world problems.

Few who survived the Vietnam War era would fail to point out how many students ignored the practical question of training. Few would fail to agree that such an attitude guaranteed that world problems could not be solved by student activism.

But what about the "serious" student of today? Grade grubbing, cheating, and unquestioned note memorization of lectures, all in abundant evidence on this and other campuses, certainly reflect the shift of emphasis. These current mores, though, can only produce corporate ciphers instead of educated men and women.

The implications of such a pretense to education are disturbing, to say the least. The crooked tactics of several multinational drug companies in Latin America, the bribery operations of Lockheed, the slush funds of 1972 and the careers of certain J. Walter Thompson executives, all reflect, in part, a failure of business schools and others to educate "serious" students like those Dean Lee admires. Maybe he should ponder the cliché of the 60's: If you're not part of the solution, you're part of the problem."

Bart is...

Editor
The Prospector
Dear Sir:

Why the brutal assault against Bart Stafford?

Bart is not anti-homosexual. He has been one of their more eloquent defenders.

Recently he reviewed two books relating to homosexuals, the title of one I forgot. In the one he praised moderate gays for pointing out various social issues. He commended their efforts to achieve acceptance in a straight world.

In the other (Rechy's, THE SEXUAL OUTLAW) Bart described it as a rutting orgy (not those exact words) from start to finish. Bart did not denounce Rechy because he was homosexual, but because he was crude. Bart is an honest, decent human being, a credit to the University and an asset to the community. His detractors should achieve so much in their lifetime.

Sincerely,
Leon Metz

Defends coaching...

Dear Editor,

In response to Mr. Nering's stand on athletic competence (7/21/77), I would like to say that while his article appears to make sense, its actual value is a mere few cents. First of all, in reference to the hiring of competent coaches, I am willing to allow Mr. Nering to try and refute the fact that Don Haskins is the best defensive basketball coach in the nation, that Ted Banks is one of the five best track coaches in America, that Bill Michael was the main reason, and backbone behind Bobby Dob's earlier football success here, and that Andy Cohen is the mold and perfect model for anyone who wishes to enter baseball.

Concerning Nering's reference to Gary Gallup as someone hired to sell chili bean hot dogs, I can validate that Gary has tremendous financial raising capabilities, and that Mr. Bowden made an excellent choice in realizing the importance of such a position in the athletic department. I suggest that Mr. Nering personally meet and investigate these duties with Gary. Oh Gary, by the way, Mr. Nering will be the one who shows up at the Special Events Center with mustard all over his clothes.

Social work...

An Open Letter to President Arlen E. Templeton (sic)
Vice President Kenneth Beasley
Dean of Liberal Arts Small (sic)

In reference to the article in The Prospector on page 5 of July 28, 1977, "New Degree Expands Mind" by Nancy Neumann, I quote: "These programs," Beasley said, "will attract some new students but more importantly will give students in El Paso a wider choice of career opportunities. This is the goal of the University to offer as wide a choice as possible."

We, the Social Work students of UTEP, would like to take our place in the sun. Take us out of the dark by telling us where the proposal for the Social Work program stands. Do we have a commitment; and if so, what is it? What priority do you place on the submission of the program (leading to a major in social work) to the Chancellor? Do you have a specific date to move it from wherever it is pigeon holed up through the chain for approval? When, if ever, is the social work discipline going to get off soft money and on to hard money?

It seems that other proposed social work programs in Texas were approved; but ours never got out of campus. It seems ridiculous to enroll in a program that does not exist except in sequence form. Just think how many more students the school would attract if there were a major in Social Work.

It seems incongruous to go to the Dean's Office for a degree plan in Social Work and leave with one where you must also major in Anthropology, Sociology or Psychology. We need to know where we stand. We want to make plans for our future. I cannot believe that the administration is insensitive to the students' desires. Include the social work student in your goals and give them their place in the sun.

Social Work Students of UTEP

Retirement law retires

The State of Maine has passed the nation's first bill stopping—the forced retirement of public employees.

The new law also calls for a study to investigate the possible application of the law in private business.

A group of gray-haired lobbyists and young lawmakers joined forces to do away with an archaic law that forced able-minded senior citizens to retire.

One can only hope that other elderly persons will be inspired by the example of Maine's senior set, and rally on a national level to end forced retirement.
