

More Denvers

DENVER, Colo.—If baseball had a few more Denvers it wouldn't have much worry about its future.

It rained Monday night with the American Association All-Star game scheduled here, and right while it was raining hardest the cash customers kept marching into Bears stadium.

When the game finally started, an hour and 15 minutes late—after some fireworks—there were 15,420 fans in the stands.

BILL MONBOUQUETTE, the 21-year-old Minneapolis righthander who was called up Monday by the Boston Red Sox, along with Bud Byerly, took his promotion in stride.

"I didn't figure I'd make it so soon," he said, "but I knew I was going to make it some time. Now I've just got to stay up there."

Duane Wilson, the southpaw the Millers received in exchange, was with Minneapolis in spring training before going to Memphis, and general manager Tommy Thomas hints there may be further announcements in a day or two.

SHORT SHOTS: Art Ruane, long connected with the Millers and now working for Rosy Ryan at Phoenix, Ariz., popped up here yesterday to renew old acquaintances . . .

Ben Geraghty of Wichita, the All-Stars' solemn-faced manager, almost broke up the pre-game luncheon with a deadpan routine about the trials and tribulations of his Wichita club . . . For once, his rival manager, Andy Cohen of Denver, was forced to take a back seat in the knife and fork league even though Andy was in top form.

Bob Darnell, the St. Paul pitcher who has been doubling in the outfield, says July 4, when he pitched the afternoon game and played right field in the night contest, was one of the longest days he ever put in — "I've found that the outfielders earn their money too," he asserts . . . Vern Rapp, the ex-Miller, is doing quite an all-around job for Denver . . . formerly a straight-up hitter, he's crouching now and hitting .320 from the new stance.

ROY HAMEY of the Phils, who play Washington at Metropolitan stadium next Monday, was on hand still peeved about the Phils' blowing a game Sunday. Charlie Grimm of the Cubs was here too along with Joe Mathes of the Cardinals and Lee MacPhail of the Yankees.
