A Few Anecdotes to Fill Local Baseball Void

Just in case you, like me (or should it be I?), are (or should it be is?) unhappy these days because Northwest league baseball no longer comes into Spokane, this corner has gone to no end of trouble and expense to enliven your Sunday morning with a gathering of baseball anecdotes. Expense? All of them have been lifted from the latest issue of Baseball Digest, which costs 25 cents (they sent me a copy free). Trouble? I had to copy them down, as follows:

Andy Cohen, who is managing Indianapolis this season, played a spell of second base for the old Giants under John McGraw—and he isn't a fellow who tries to forget those days.

"I was struggling, hoping to make the team," Andy recalled, "and one day I had an awful time the first few innings. I lost a couple of pop flies, and almost got hit by one. Back on the bench I said to Mr. McGraw (Ed.'s note: They all called him Mr. McGraw):

"That's a terrible air current out there today, sir. Those whirlwinds make the ball do funny things."

"McGraw looked at me and said, 'Those aren't whirlwinds, young man, those are trade winds—and you're going to Minneapolis tomorrow.'"
