Andy Cohen, former New Orleans manager: "I resigned because I felt I was going to be let out. It turned out I was wise in making the move as early as I did. I really didn't know where I was going to manage next summer. Then Cleveland moved Kerby Farrell from Indianapolis as manager, and when that opening was created, I was offered the job."

Wirt Gammon, Chattanooga Times: "Some writers say the breakdown on voting for the Heisman trophy, which Paul Hornung won, shows that Tommy McDonald got more first place votes than Hornung, but that a quirk in the voting gave the award to the Irish star. Johnny Majors carried the Southeast solidly and McDonald swept the Southwest and Midlands, with neither gaining much second or third place support from the other areas. Hornung got big second and third place support from all over."
