

DOESN'T 'PARADE'
 IOWA PITCHERS
Lollar Stays Calm
 —But Oaks 'Bombed'

By a Special Correspondent
 DENVER, COLO. — Fifteen years ago Ralph Houk, now of the New York Yankees, was manager of the Denver Bears in the American Association and Andy Cohen was piloting the Indianapolis Indians.

"I sure would like to really rip them in the first game of the series," Houk used to say whenever Indianapolis was coming to the Mile High City to play.

"If we can score a lot of runs in the first game, Cohen will panic and tear up his pitching staff for the whole series and we'll have a good chance to sweep the series."

Didn't Panic
 Tuesday night Iowa's Sherm Lollar, who's had two previous seasons of experience managing visiting clubs in Denver, came face to face with the problems that used to panic Cohen.

In fact, he faced them to an acute degree in the early innings of a 10-4 Iowa defeat.

But no one could say he panicked. If anything, one might be tempted to say he reacted the other way. He was so determined to stay with starter Gary Timberlake and not parade his staff that it took the supreme "insult" to get him to bench the southpaw with Denver leading, 9-2, in the second inning.

That insult was the first base hit of Denver pitcher Rick Henninger's four-year pro career, coming on his eighty-fifth official time at bat. The line drive to right field gave Henninger a career batting average of .012.

Henninger's hit brought Lollar scrambling out of the third-base dugout waving for Bob Stickels, who did a fine job from that point through the seventh before departing for a pinch-hitter.

"We're a little short in the bullpen right now after sending Dennis Myers back home with that knee laceration and with Gary Waslewski nursing an injury," Lollar explained.

'Didn't Get It'
 "And it's always tough to go into your bullpen that early. Timberlake got out of the first inning with five runs and I thought if he could hold them there for a few innings we might get back in the ball game.

"You know it's easier to have a big inning in this ball park than some others. But we didn't get it."

Lollar figures he helped his bullpen considerably by using only Stickels and Marcel Lachemann (one inning) for relief.

"We had a couple of guys who needed a day off," Lollar added, "and we got it for them."

The only bright spot for the Oaks came in the fifth inning when three cheap hits and one good one produced two runs and left two aboard with one out and Denver ahead, 9-4.

But Henninger easily disposed of Ramon Webster and Rene Lachemann and shut them out the rest of the way.

Tim Cullen's throwing arm, hurt about two weeks, bothered him again in pre-game workout and Lollar replaced him in the lineup with Gaylen Pitts, who drove in the first two Iowa runs.
