

Baseball Clinic Starts Next Week

Would you like to learn how to play baseball from your home-owned Indianapolis Indians?

Then here's an opportunity you'll want to take advantage of.

Now is the time to make plans to participate in the fifth annual Indianapolis News baseball clinic for boys 8 to 16 years of age. Clinic dates are July 9 and 10, so be sure you're on hand when Tribe Manager Andy Cohen shouts "Play ball" at Victory Field.

Every boy in the state is eligible to take part in the free clinic, which will be held on the Victory Field diamond. You'll have fun as you learn the fine points of the game. And what you learn you can apply to your Little League play.

If you have a uniform, wear it and bring your glove and, if you're a catcher, your backstop attire. Every boy will play. At your position you'll receive instructions from Indians who play that position.

Ownie Bush, president of the club, and News Sports Editor William F. Fox Jr. will supervise the two-day event.

Boys 8 through 11 will "train" Tuesday, July 9, from 9:30 a.m. until approximately 1 p.m. The following day the seniors—12 to 16—will be coached by the Indians.

The public is invited to watch the show—world's largest participating clinic for boys—from the stands.

The Indians—defending American Association and little world series champions—will be assisted by former major leaguers now living in Indianapolis.

As an added treat, all boys who take part in the clinic will be guests of the Indianapolis management at the Indians' game with the St. Paul Saints the evening following their clinic session. Admission will be by card signed by Bush and Fox, which will acknowledge the bearer as a "graduate" of the clinic.

Little League, Junior Baseball and other league managers may bring their teams in a group. There is no registration.
