man on first broke for second, Frisch took just one step toward the bag to cover and the batter hit one just past Frank. He would have had a double play if he hadn't taken that one step.

"The Cards went on to score a couple of runs that eventually won the ball game, and when the inning ended McGraw was fuming.

"As Frisch came into the bench McGraw called him a dumb blankety - blank Dutchman, Frisch, whom McGraw had been riding pretty hard for several weeks, made some reply, there were a couple of more words and that ended it. As far as I know nothing was said in the clubhouse, but Frisch didn't show up at the park the next day.

"He had gone back home to New York, and the only person he told was George Kelly, the first baseman who was a close friend of Frisch's.

"Of course, that finished Frisch, although he completed the season everyone knew he would be traded because McGraw had to save face.

"He was traded for Hornsby after the season ended, and before the 1928 season started Hornsby was traded to Boston.

"I'm not complaining but when I opened the season in 1928 it was only natural that everyone compared me to Hornsby. I got off real well at the plate and they even started running a box every day in the paper comparing my average to Hornsby's. That was fine for about 10 days, but Hornsby ended up leading the league while I hit about .278, which was respectable anyway."

Cohen drifted back to the minors, then managed for 16 seasons, scouted for a year and now is returning to the big leagues after an absence of 30 years.

"I started my big league career in Philadelphia, and may be I'm going to end it there, too," Cohen said. "I just hope we can do something this season."
